Bioactivity of Aqueous and Oil-in-Water Emulsions of Hydrolysed Soy Protein Flour as a Matrix in Non-Invasive Soft Tissue Repair. Non-invasive bioprinting of micro/nanofibres has emerged as a promising technique to create tissue substitutes and is currently undergoing a dramatic growth. Despite the high potential that this technique holds, there are still many challenges to overcome. The aim of this work was to assess the effect of different aqueous and oil-in-water (o/w) blends of hydrolysed soy protein (HSP) as a biopolymeric matrix in non-invasive bioprinting of micro/nanofibres, to validate its use in soft tissue repair.

Bioprinting was performed with HSP at 1%, 4% and 8% w/v, under different printing conditions (concentration, speed and volume), yielding aqueous and oil-in-water emulsions. These were then used to print calcium alginate micro/nanofibres. In vitro cell culture using human fibroblasts (HFF-1) showed the best attachment and spreading of fibroblasts with HSP emulsions, thus validating the use of emulsion-derived micro/nanofibres as a novel and promising matrix to create tissue substitutes in non-invasive bioprinting. In vivo animal studies were conducted using full-thickness skin wounds in rats, with good results. Histological analyses showed a well-organised and consolidated matrix with a normal arrangement of collagen fibres, as well as an increase in the density of collagen fibres, and deposition of an extracellular matrix rich in proteins, such as glycosaminoglycans, fibronectin, fibrin and type I collagen. In conclusion, we have confirmed the possibility of printing HSP emulsions as a biopolymeric matrix to create tissue substitutes with the potential to be used for biop
